Call for Papers

October 20, 2004

The Editors of the Journal of E-Government invite submissions for articles, book reviews, and commentaries for the Journal, which is published by Haworth Press beginning 2004.

The response to the initial Call for Papers for the first volume consisting of four issues has been overwhelming. As a consequence, the Journal's editors have decided to introduce a rolling submission deadline. Thus, there will be no specific deadlines to follow and submissions are encouraged at any time. However, it should be noted that in order to ensure consideration for a specific issue of the Journal, submissions should be received approximately three months prior to publication date.

Papers may be on any aspect of e-government, ranging from local to national and international initiatives and developments. We stress that we welcome and encourage articles from practitioners of e-government and industry experts as well as researchers in the field.

We seek a broad range of case studies, research articles, reviews, and industry notes relevant to the evolving field of e-government. Practitioners and academicians may also wish to submit papers as commentaries. Submissions are encouraged from all allied fields, including government and public administration, political science, public health, justice and law enforcement, communications, public finance, and other fields related to the use of information and communication technology in the public sector. As noted in our mission statement, the Journal welcomes submissions from both academicians and practitioners.

Authors are encouraged to familiarize themselves with Journal and Haworth Press publication requirements. All submission, style and other information may be found online at <http://www.egovjournal.com>

Thank you for your interest in the Journal of E-Government. Please feel free to email or pass this Call for Papers on to interested colleagues.

Sincerely,

The Editors
